- The choice of equipment and methods of work and production shall be made with a view in particular to reducing monotonous and repetitive work and its effects on the health of workers.
- Prevention planning shall aim at a coherent whole integrating technology, organisation of work, working conditions, social relations and the influence of environmental factors at work.
- Only workers who have received sufficient information shall be allowed access to an area with a serious and specific risk.
- Before a worker is assigned to a task, his professional safety and health capability to carry out the task must be considered.
- In assessing the hazardousness of processes, the consequences of possible distractions or non-dangerous imprudence on the part of workers in carrying out such processes shall be considered.
